This picture was later transferred to the Provinzialmuseum (later renamed the Landesmuseum) in Hannover, where it remained till the time of the artist's death in 1935. Around this time, the museum's director, Alexander Dorner, who was an avid supporter of the Russian avant-garde, brought the picture with him to the United States when he fled Nazi Germany in 1938. At the time of Dorner's death in 1957, this work was left to the Busch-Reisinger Museum at Harvard University, where it was held until its return to the rightful owners (the Malevich heirs). As stated on the inventory card in the Busch-Reisinger Museum, the painting was "left in trust by Alexander Dorner until such time as the rightful owner claims the painting and proves his legal right to it." In 1999, the painting was returned to the Malevich family in accordance with Dorner's wishes.
